

Ancestral wisdom

AND HOW TO PASS IT ON

In Western society, we are used to understanding life through the lens of the individual. When challenges arise, we often look for personal causes and personal solutions. While this approach has value, it can also limit how we understand what is really happening.

Many traditional cultures view human life as part of a much wider field of relationships. From this perspective, a person is always connected to community, ancestors, the natural world, and future generations.

This training weekend, guided by traditional teachers from Botswana, explores these connections. Systemic teachings, reflection, dialogue, and embodied practices are woven together, offering an accessible yet profound exploration of relationship, belonging, and our place in the larger whole.

Facilitators

Niall Campbell

<https://www.niallcampbellafrica.com/>

Niall Campbell (also known as Phokojwe (the Jackal)) is a sangoma, a traditional doctor nyanga (medicine man), a doctor of traditional ceremonies as well as institutions as well as a Ngaka ya diKoma, a doctor of rites. He is a world-renowned specialist in men's rites of passage.

Niall (pronounced Neil) has over 25 years of apprenticeship in ancestral and nature spirits, divination and medicinal herbalism with African teachers. He facilitates men's rites of passage, initiations, entering adulthood and manhood and is widely regarded as one of the foremost holders of traditional ways.

He is the subject of numerous international documentaries on shamanic healers and consults, lectures and works all over the world.

Koko Kgomari

Koko Kgomari is a sangoma (spiritual healer) from Botswana.

Starting In 2005, at the age of 13, Moemedi Mphahlele (his birth name) experienced the symptoms of the Calling to become a Sangoma.

Koko Kgomari runs a school of Sangoma training in Botswana. To date he has initiated more than 20 Sangomas. In the training he teaches traditional medicine, divination and ancestral rituals.

Koko Kgomari is a specialist and has a practice in cleansing rituals that remove spiritual obstacles and restore balance with ancestors and community.

Koko Kgomari is also involved in family constellations. He is interested in working with non-Africans who are drawn to traditional African healing
